

Unscored Upon

Racism was not supposed to be part of a white boys life growing up in Michigan in the 1950s and early 1960s. Slavery was in the past, and segregation was supposedly in the South. Moving to Cincinnati with his family in 1961, the author found himself on an integrated football team which was challenged to go through its season undefeated and unscored upon. He found himself straddling two social worlds separated by race and was witness to a love triangle which threatened to penetrate the barrier between black males and white females. Carla, a young Jewish girl, was infatuated with Terry, a roguish white boy who would certainly corrupt her. His competition was an incorruptible young man named Michael, but Michael was black. This is a story about a team trying to protect its end zone from violation, about a young black man trying to rescue a white girl from violation, and about a group of young people violating the segregationist rules that existed in the North.
